Innovative Reentry Strategies: The Emerging Role of Correctional Industries

Imagine a reentry program that reduces recidivism, changes lives, and makes prisons and jails safer with little or no cost to taxpayers. Such a program has been around for decades. It's correctional industries, an effective model for preparing offenders for employment upon release. The elements of this strategy include skills certification, positive change, collaboration with businesses and the community, and a focus on career development and job retention.

On October 7, 2009, the National Institute of Corrections presents part 2 of its series on correctional industries during an interactive 3-hour live satellite/Internet broadcast entitled "Innovative Reentry Strategies: The Emerging Role of Correctional Industries." Part 1, which aired in August 2008, focused on the history and benefits of correctional industries and ways to balance competing interests. The October 2009 program will focus on presenting new reentry strategies and highlight specific programs around the country that reflect best practices.

Participants in the 3-hour satellite/Internet broadcast will be able to identify:

- The growing role of correctional industries in the reentry process.
- Best practices in innovative correctional industries related to successful reentry.
- Strategies for promoting collaborations that increase the effectiveness of correctional industries on reentry.
- Positive reentry outcomes resulting from correctional industries.
- The future of correctional industries.

Participants will be able to call in questions using the toll-free telephone number shown during the broadcast.
